

Plenty of differing views when it comes to photo radar

by Bill Rea

Calls have been increasing lately to have the province re-instate photo radar.

But local provincial politicians are split on how effective, and proper it is as a method of enforcing traffic speeds.

Photo radar, which involves taking pictures of speeding vehicles and then fining the registered owners of these cars through the mail, was brought in by Bob Rae's NDP government in 1994. It was scrapped shortly after the Progressive Conservatives under Mike Harris came in the following year.

The calls to bring the program back have been growing in light of the recent carnage on the roads, including those incidents involving street racing.

York North MPP Julia Munro likened photo radar to the cameras that have been set up at certain intersections to catch people running red lights.

"I don't know how effective they are," she declared. "Do people go to court? Do they fight it?"

Munro added it might be a good idea in theory, but she wouldn't want the result to be police officers being pulled off their jobs to defend more fines in court.

Although it was a PC government (with Munro as a member) that scrapped the program in 1995, Munro said there's more difference of opinion in the party now. "There are members of our caucus on both sides of the issue," she remarked.

Nancy Morrison, who is going to be running for the NDP in York — Simcoe in this year's provincial election, said this issue is a "very emotional" one for her, having lost a nephew to an impaired driver two years ago.

She said she's in favour of bringing it back. "It does slow people down, and that's a good thing," she declared.

But she added the photo radar must be accompanied by increased police enforcement.

She did agree it could be argued that it doesn't address an offence at the time it's committed, or deal with other problems like impaired driving. "It is a deterrent that helps slow down traffic," she said.

Addressing the number of police officers on the job, Morrison said it's dropped to 187 per 100,000 population from 190 in 2003.

"We need to get the officers back out there," she said. "We need to give the officers the tools they need to protect families."

As well, Morrison said chiefs of police generally support photo radar.

York — Simcoe Liberal candidate John Gilbank admitted he's not very well-versed on the issue.

"I'm not generally favourable to reduction of privacy," he said.

He agreed photo radar doesn't sound like much of an infringement, especially since it only applies to people who are breaking the law. But he added quality of life depends to a large extent on the feeling of being responsible for one's self. "Being watched reduces this sense of independence and self-responsibility," he commented.

Essa moves towards licensing of small businesses

by Richard Blanchard

Essa council has moved towards a licensing system for the township's small businesses but support for the proposal was not universal.

Council voted to four to one in favour of the plan but the township's deputy mayor Terry Dowdall said that the plan would create more problems for small businesses in the municipality.

"It's a pretty big issue. I know that there are a lot more small businesses, operating from homes in the township, than what you would think," said deputy mayor Terry Dowdall.

Council had rejected a licensing system during the last term of council but mayor Dave Guergis said that the township needed some sort of framework in order to provide some means of control if problems resulted from the home-based businesses.

"You know the sort of problems that we had had recently with a couple of small home based businesses," he said.

"Licensing them gives us a say in their future proposals," said Guergis.

Dowdall responded that he felt that it was going to result in another layer of red tape for small business people.

Thornton area councillor Rick Newlove said that he wanted the process as uncomplicated as possible.

"I don't want people required to come in every year for a license but I'd like to have some sort of control on them," he said.

The proposed bylaw would require small businesses not to change the residential character of the property, limit the amount of floor area devoted to the home business no more than 15% of the gross floor area of the home and limit the hours of operation so that they could not operate all night.

Council agreed to the licensing proposal in general. A bylaw will come to council at a future meeting.
